State And Government In Medieval

The state in the Middle Ages had government but, in real terms, it was guided by the diktat of the Pope. Naturally the king had no authority to take any decision. The state in the medieval period was a religious state. It was believed—or the people were made to believe—that both the state and its rulers were the creation of God. God was the ultimate source of all authority.

The prevailing system of government in the Middle Ages was feudalism. Though the actual term "feudalism" was not used during the Middle Ages, what we now recognize as a feudalist system of government was in control in Medieval Europe. Feudalism was a way for the Kings and upper nobility to keep control over the serfs and peasants.

Government in the Middle Ages - The Finer Times

The legacy of the Middle Ages was so intractable that the emergence of nation-states was very slow. It may be argued, however, that the modern period was born during the reign of Henry VIII of England (reigned 1509-47), when that king more or less simultaneously declared himself head of the national church and his realm an empire—sovereign and unanswerable to any foreign potentate, particularly the pope .

The nature of State in Medieval India has been a subject of great controversy amongst the scholar. Scholars like Dr. R.P. Ashraf, Dr. Ishwari Prasad, Prof. A.L. Srivastava, etc. hold that the Muslim state in Medieval India was theocracy. For example Dr. R.P. Tripathi says, "All the institutions that the Muslims either evolved or adopted were intended to sub-serve the law."
